

Psychology and Pedagogy of Writing: A Resume of the Researches and Experiments Bearing on the History and Pedagogy of Writing (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from Psychology and Pedagogy of Writing: A Resume of the Researches and Experiments Bearing on the History and Pedagogy of Writing Years of practical teaching and supervision, the earnest study of psychology and its application to education, a wide observation of the school work being done by this and other nations, have all been potent forces in convincing me that the reason why practice lags so far behind principles in psychology is that the greater portion of the results obtained by expert, psychological experimenters remains filed away on the research shelves of the libraries of our great universities, unknown and unread by the large mass of educators. Our new psychology is in the nascent or formative stage and the material still remains scattered and unorganized, so much so that only recently has any reliable author undertaken to glean, sift, organize and show the application of the most important principles of psychology to the teaching of the common school subjects. For years teachers have had their brains fairly satiated with method books evolved from the inner consciousness of this or the other author of uncertain psychological caliber. For convenience all method may be classed as: (1) historical, or doing as has been done before by others; (2) trial and success, or hitting upon successful ways by numerous trials of different methods of procedure, or following out those discovered by others; and (3) psychological method, based upon the study of children and their near and remote needs. Much of the psychological method may be found in the first two mentioned methods, but it is unknown to the mechanical, unintelligent teacher.
