

Mind, Vol. 6: A Quarterly Review of Psychology and Philosophy; 1897 (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from Mind, Vol. 6: A Quarterly Review of Psychology and Philosophy; 1897. Nothing could be more startling prima facie to the philosophical student than the proposition that the science of society is a creation of strictly modern thought; of thought, that is, not merely recent in time, but determined by distinctively modern conditions and owning no continuity with the central tradition of European philosophy. Yet this was undoubtedly the view of Auguste Comte; it was implied by Mill in the sixth book of the Logic; and the same standpoint reveals itself in the independence and isolation which Sociology, or la Science Sociale, maintains to-day as against Plato and Aristotle on the one hand and their modern representatives - e.g., Spinoza and Hegel - on the other. It is not my intention, in the following observations, to challenge the claims of Sociology to an origin and existence independent of Ethical or Social Philosophy; my purpose is rather to suggest an analogy in accordance with which this independence may be justified on the basis of a definite relation between the two types of theory. Certain traits of parallelism and even of convergence will, however, necessarily disclose themselves as between lines of investigation so closely akin. And each, it will appear probable, may have something to learn from the other. About the Publisher Forgotten Books publishes hundreds of thousands of rare and classic books.
