Excerpt: ... CHAPTER XII ANTON VANDYCK Anton Vandyck. was the seventh child of a family of twelve, and was born in Antwerp in the year 1599. His father was a silk merchant in that city, and the family was possessed of considerable wealth. None of his relations, however, were distinguished in any way for artistic talent, although his mother had gained considerable fame for her skill in embroidery--it is said, indeed, that she was busily engaged upon work of this kind just before the birth of her illustrious son--and it was from her that he learned the rudiments of drawing. Although he became at an early age a pupil of Hendrick van Balen, he did not stay long with him, for the overwhelming influence of the style of Rubens was beginning to be felt everywhere: young Vandyck succumbed at once to it, and, after a year with Van Balen, was received by Rubens into his studio. Once there he was not long in showing of what things he was capable, and Rubens formed the highest opinion of his powers. In fact, he watched over him with particular care, and it was to Vandyck that he entrusted the making of drawings from those pictures which he wished to have engraved. The following story is sufficient to prove the esteem in which his young pupil was held. Each evening when Rubens had finished his days work, it was his habit, as we know, to go for a ride on horseback into the country, to rest his mind and to seek fresh inspiration for his work. His pupils, taking advantage of his absence, would try to have a look at the paintings on which he had been working during the day; they would coax and persuade the old servant Valveken, who had the keys of the private studio, to let them in, and occasionally they were successful in obtaining admission. One day when they were all crowding rou...
