Not illustrated. 1918 edition. Excerpt: ... Chapter 5 Peyote Religion. Some years ago the writer became interested in a question involving the use among the American Indians of a species of cactus in certain ceremonies of a religious nature, varying somewhat among the different tribes, the ceremonies in general being called the Mescal religion, a term derived from mescal button, as the dried plants are designated by some, though they are wholly different from the plants from which the well known Mexican drink mescal is derived. My interest was aroused by coming in contact with Mr. Philip Cook, a member of the Oklahoma Cheyennes, and Three Fingers, a chief of the same tribe, who told me of the ceremonies and the extended use of the plant among the Oklahoma tribes in particular and the American tribes in general, they insisting that the adoption of the Mescal religion by the American Indians was universal. Their immediate object in presenting the matter to me was to convince me not only of the rapid extension of its use among the Indians of the United States, but also to demonstrate the firm hold which this religion, so strangely fascinating to the Indian, has taken upon the Oklahoma tribes and the Cheyennes in particular..They were emphatic in their assertions that neither the missionaries among the Indians nor the combined efforts of the Government agents and the missionaries had succeeded either in checking the spread of the religion or stopping the traffic in the plant, and that in all probability the Indians would not abandon the religion until something in their opinion equally as good and effective in a religious or ceremonial way is substituted for this strange cult. This insistence by these worthy representatives of the aboriginal Americans, upon the universal extent...
