

The New Psychiatry: Being the Morison Lectures Delivered at the Royal College of Physicians of Edinburgh in March 1915 (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from The New Psychiatry: Being the Morison Lectures Delivered at the Royal College of Physicians of Edinburgh in March 1915

The following lectures are a brief, almost too brief, summary of the principles and practice of psycho-analysis, and they are now published in book form at the suggestion of many friends who have not the time to wade through the very extensive literature of the subject. The almost unjustifiable brevity was in the first instance necessitated by the obligation to condense the matter within the space of three hours; but I have agreed to publish the lectures for the most part as they were delivered, as I am told that they are clear and comprehensible as they stand.

In the domain of mental disease this new psychiatry, which has not yet received sufficient recognition in this country, is one of the most important problems of the day; but it is an intrinsically difficult subject, concerning which a complete doctrine has not yet been elaborated, although an enormous amount of patient labour has been expended upon it during the last twenty years.

Psycho-analysis has, of course, met with captious criticism, the inevitable destiny of a new truth, but this has been especially severe in the case of our new psychiatry for four reasons: -(1) The critics do not read psycho-analytic articles, or they do so only superficially, so that they arrive at quite extraordinary misconceptions. (2) Not one of them has given the method a full and practical trial. (3) Basing their criticisms upon sentiment and prejudice, they assume an attitude of moral indignation or haughty contempt, seeking an answer to the question, Are these principles to my liking? instead of the question, Are these principles true?
