In the spring of 1913, the writer of this monograph began some minor investigations concerning the effect of disturbances of various sorts upon mental work. These preliminary experiments led to the attack of the problem on a broader basis. The quality and quantity of the work done in the first experiments showed little or no effect from the disturbances, but before concluding that such disturbances were entirely unimportant we determined to give the thing a more thorough test. The apparatus used in the beginning required a short intermission between each minute of work; a new mechanism was therefore devised that would permit constant work for an indefinite period. As the disturbances had been comparatively weak, it was decided to use as severe disturbances as could be gotten and then after we had discovered the effect of these to reduce the intensity. As will appear later, any reduction proved unnecessary and useless. Finally we determined if no effect could be discovered in the time and accuracy records to use any test available to ascertain if there was any effect at all from disturbing influences. Such a test as we proposed required rather elaborate and very accurate apparatus and so we need make no apology for the somewhat lengthy and detailed description of it. Its construction occupied a period of six months, but after once completed was of such a nature that it gave perfect satisfaction and the records throughout are highly reliable. After our work on the main part of the problem, experiments of a different nature were carried on to corroborate the conclusions reached. The apparatus for these was simple and will be described briefly in connection with the experiments. The work was completed in the fall of 1915. It is with great pleasure that we acknowledge the advice and encouragement received from Professors Woodworth and Cattell and Dr. Poffenberger. We wish also to thank those who were so kind as to work as subjects under conditions that were far from inviting.
