

The Psychology of the Boy (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from The Psychology of the Boy It is manifestly impossible to know what knowledge of Psychology, its terms and its methods of thought, any given reader of this book will possess. It is therefore assumed that he has none whatever. It will follow from this somewhat sweeping assumption of ignorance that every reader will be likely to find parts of what follows irritatingly elementary. It is suggested to the reader that, should a feeling of personal annoyance come to him, he will seek to restrain it by the recollection that the author, by his method, is seeking to provide an important kind of safety. The risk that the already instructed be annoyed is less serious than the risk that the keen and eager should be befogged. It must always be a pity that thought should be stopped short by an unyielding technicality. However delicately accurate such a technicality may be to the initiate, it is a tragedy to the new man. In the pages that follow, wherever the choice lay between a rough statement in the terms of common speech and a careful statement in terms of technical accuracy, the former always has been chosen. The writer has tried to be intelligible to the average worker among boys, for he conceives him to be of paramount importance. If it is possible for a man with ordinary mental equipment and training to read this book without understanding all of it, the book will have failed.
