Not illustrated. 1903 Excerpt: ...bear the names of cadent and ascendant modes of causing. So too with Move!; I cannot perceive it solely as the imperative or commanding mode of motion; I must also see it as the mobile mode of command. Thus the subjunctive (or other mode) in the conclusion of a condition, I should rank as a pseudo-subjunctive with really full assertive intensity. For, even at its weakest, the conclusion is what I believe to be true in impossible cases (see p. 393); and such restriction of cases can hardly more invalidate assertion (or belief in truth) than restriction to no cases at all, as in Lemons never exceed oranges. Yet, so far as I have observed, no claim is made that in this sentence exceed is stripped of any assertive intensity, although the scope of assertion is obviously reduced to zero. Again, as the merest piece of introspection, I note that, answering your If you were three men, you wouldnt eat more, my Yes, I should appears to me to be as distinctly an assertion as any shall or did that I could utter. Moreover, if one accession of meaning puts a verb into a different mode, fair play would seem to call for change of modal rank with other accessions. I see no reason for laying greater stress upon an added idea of command, than on the more effective, and so far more important, idea of aid. If an expression meaning I command you to climb have modal recognition, much more an expression meaning I assist you to climb would seem in ordinary justice to require modal recognition also. With the courage of tJiis conviction, given I help you over the fence (meaning I assist you to climb, etc), I might announce this help&qu...
